The Phonograph and the Treaty of Sulu

Robert Feinstein

Research invariably uncovers fascinating stories involving the early history of the phonograph, but few incidents have personally intrigued me as much as the one I am about to relate.

In the years immediately following the Spanish-American War (1898), occupying U.S. troops sometimes fought fierce battles with various groups of insurgents in the Philippine Islands. Moro tribesmen, who inhabited the Sulu Archipelago of the Philippines, were

DEAR APM:

Question: I recently found a phonograph box called a Wizard. Can you tell me more about it?
G.B., Olive Branch, Miss.

Answer: The Wizard Phonograph was originally designed as a reciprocating 2-4 min. cylinder machine, produced by the International Phonograph Co. of Newark, N.J. It was invented by Pliny Catucci who filed the patent for it on November 17, 1910. It is similar to the earlier Rex in construction, and is considered fairly rare. The works are inverted into its own carrying case, similar to some European models.

One of the earliest phonograph magazines ever printed was The Edison Phonograph Monthly, published at West Orange, N.J., and sent exclusively to Edison dealers about 70 years ago. It is quite a rare publication today and Wendell Moore deserves our thanks for re-issuing the originals, year by year. Available now is Volume One (1903-1904), beautifully bound in gold-stamped, hard red covers. It is a limited printing of 1000 and all collectors are advised to obtain it, as it gives a good "behind-the-scenes" look at the Edison enterprise.

Here are all the new horn attachments, models, prices, instructions, etc. when they were news. Also monthly record lists, stories, ads, letters, illustrations, maintenance tips, etc. One of the intriguing stories, in a monthly search for the largest record collection then around, was about O. Looker of Detroit, who had nearly every Bettini record made. This book, and all future volumes in the series, are highly recommended. Charter subscribers will receive a reservation number to be assured future copies. They are available for $12.95 ppd. from Wendell Moore, #33 Arctic Springs, Jeffersonville, Ind. 47130.

Readers will remember the words and music of the Song of Mister Phonograph, as they appear in ECR, 1889-1912. This was the first song written for the phonograph, penned by a 16-year-old lad in 1878. To our knowledge, it has never been recorded in any form (other than tinfoil), so it is a pleasant surprise so see that Mark Kaplan has re-issued it on a standard 88-note piano roll, with the words printed directly on the paper. We recently heard it at the Drake Museum and it even survived a quartet of amateur singers. We would suggest though that the tempo be run a little faster than marked for a more lively run. It is available, for $5.98 ppd., from Mark Kaplan, 49 Hancock St., Rochester, N.Y. 14611.

among the toughest adversaries faced by the soldiers and it soon became a primary American goal to make peace with them. This could not be done unless contact was made with Hadji Mohammed Jumalul Kiram, the Sultan of Sulu and the supreme ruler of the Moros. The man picked for this task was Brigadier General John C. Bates, an officer with a reputation for both courage and initiative. General Bates, who was the son of Edward Bates, Attorney General in President Lincoln's Cabinet, boarded the U.S.S. Charleston and arrived in Moro territory early in the summer of 1899.

The General was to realize that the task before him was by no means an easy one. Four times he dispatched emissaries to the Sultan with requests that the potentate meet with him aboard the Charleston, but each of these entreaties was refused. Determined not to fail, General Bates decided that the only way he could bring the Sultan to the negotiating table would be to stage a show of force, and he ordered the Charleston's guns to fire at a mound of rocks on the shore. None of the hundreds of frightened Moros who witnessed the explosion was injured, but the incident so impressed the Sultan that he and his retinue quickly paddled a canoe to the Charleston. The Moros must have expected a lengthy stay on the frigate and wanted to make sure they would not be hungry. All of them carried huge sacks of rice as they ascended a ladder on the side of the ship and they literally staggered under their heavy burdens. This precaution was unnecessary because even though the talks between the Sultan and General Bates dragged out for more than five weeks, most of the discussions took place on land. It was only in the final days of the talks that the Sultan and his aides returned to the Charleston.

During the brief time in which the Moros were aboard, General Bates used the Charleston's many technological contrivances to both amaze and entertain his somewhat reluctant guests. For example, Sultan Kiram was asked to press an electrical button and a servant immediately appeared in the doorway. When the Sultan pushed the button two more times, a U.S. marine showed up and from that moment on, anything that in any way resembled a button was pressed by the curious Moros. The ship's electric lights were also of particular interest to them and they never tired of switching them on and off. While these antics undoubtedly amused Moro and American alike, one incident almost ended tragically.

The main weapon of the Moro warriors was the bolo, although a few did possess some old, rusty muskets, about which one American trooper once said: "I would have considered it safer to be shot at by one of them than to shoot..."

It was only natural that the Moros were fascinated by the automatic machine guns shown to them and the Sultan tried his own skill at firing one into the sea. But he panicked when he found that he could not stop the weapon and it was only the fact that he soon ran out of ammunition which prevented the many bystanders from being struck by bullets. An even more impressive, though certainly less dangerous device was yet to be exhibited.

Sultana Inchy Jamela, who was the Sultan's mother and who also greatly influenced his decisions, was one of the Moros exposed to the Charleston's wonders on August 20, 1899, the final day of the negotiations. An officer on the ship owned a phonograph and someone suggested that it be played for the natives, none of whom had ever heard one before. All of them were awed and delighted by the demonstration and this was especially so of the Sultana who listened to the phonograph in an almost trance-like state, (not unlike some modern collectors!). She remained quiet until the exact moment when her son was about to sign the paper signifying the end of Moro-American hostilities. At that point, she suddenly refused to let him sign unless the phonograph was immediately presented to her as a gift. For a while it looked as if Mr. Edison's favorite invention was going to ruin all of General Bates' exhausting efforts, for its owner was understandably reluctant to part with it. Fortunately, he was finally persuaded to give up the prized possession and the machine was presented to Inchy Jamela as the Sultan signed the peace treaty. But the incident and the war had further ramifications.

Much of my information about these events came from an article written for the January 23, 1904 issue of Scientific American by E.C. Rost, an adventurer who had accompanied General Bates to the Sulu Archipelago. Unfortunately, Rost's account left many unanswered questions. For about a year, I have been trying to find out additional information about the phonograph and recordings which were involved in the story, as well as the identity of the patriotic officer who relinquished them. Moreover, my curiosity has been aroused as to whether or not he was ever compensated for his loss. I have read everything I have been able to find about the Moros, the Sultan of Sulu, Sultana Inchy Jamela, Rost, and Brigadier Bates, but the story has remained shrouded in mystery. Eventually the thought occurred to me that the U.S.S. Charleston's log might shed some light on the matter. I traced the elusive document to the Old Army and Navy Branch of the U.S. National Archives, in Washington, D.C. A staff member of the Archives kindly examined the log's entries for the summer of 1899, but the results were disappointing. For the most part, the log contains weather reports and technical data about the voyage, with surprisingly few references to the negotiations between the Moros and General Bates. A photocopy of the log's entry for August 17, 1899, describing a gun salute for the Sultan of Sulu, appears on page 6.

The Treaty of Sulu, also variously known as the Treaty of Jolo and the Bates Treaty, was not very popular with Americans. Many people objected to the fact that as a reward for accepting United States administration over Moro areas, the Sultan of Sulu was given a monthly stipend of $250.00 in gold. Still too, there had been a flourishing slave trade in the Sulu Archipelago of the Philippines and one of the Treaty of Jolo's provisions allowed slaves to purchase their own freedom. Consequently, not a few of its critics pointed out that the Treaty of Sulu put the United States in the position of permitting slavery in the Philippines, an allegation which General Bates was many times to deny vehemently. Whatever the case may have been, the American authorities formally halted slavery in 1903 and Congress abrogated the Treaty in March of 1904, after a series of clashes between Moros and U.S. soldiers. But despite its short duration, the Treaty of Sulu had yet another link with the early history of the phonograph.

At the very least it can be said that the pact signed on the Charleston did, for a time, pacify the Sulu Archipelago. Believing the area to be safe, a number of civilians began to visit it and one of them was George Ade, the Indiana born playwright and humorist, who spent several days as the Sultan's guest in the year 1900. Ade took many notes about the Sultan's habits and from them wrote The Sultan of Sulu, a highly successful musical comedy which opened in Chicago in 1902 and enjoyed long runs on Broadway and in theaters in other parts of the nation. Several sets of records were made from the Broadway production, which starred veteran actor Frank Moulan as the Sultan.

A sampling of records produced while the play was popular would include the following:

GEORGE ADE'S MUSICAL SATIRE, IN TWO ACTS, ENTITLED

The Sultan of Sulu

Music by ALFRED G. WATHALL.

EXPLANATORY NOTE.

Sulu, or Jolo, is the largest of the Southerly Islands in the Philippine group. The chief ruler of the island is Hadji Mohammed Jamalul Ki-ram, Sultan of Sulu and Brother of the Sun in his own estimation. His rule has been disputed by certain dattos or chiefs, with whom he has kept up a running warfare. One of the characteristic features of this warfare has been the abduction of women. The natives of Sulu are Mohammedans, polygamists and slaveholders. The American troops landed at Sulu in 1899, and after some parleying came to a peaceable agreement with the Malay ruler. He renounced his title of Sultan and became Governor at a fixed salary. "The Sultan of Sulu" is not an attempt to show what subsequently happened, but merely what might have happened.

The 1903 playbill from Broadway's Wallack's Theater shown on page 5 also may be of interest to APM readers because Leona Anderson is listed as playing the role of a school marm. In the late 1950's, the same actress was still active, playing a very frightening character in The House on Haunted Hill, a horror film which featured Vincent Price. Around that time she also made frequent guest appearances on Jack Paar's old "Tonight Show," billing herself as "The World's Worst Singer." Her record album, cut for RKO Records under the catchy title of "Music To Suffer By," was Miss Anderson's attempt to live up to her claim, and give RCA's Florence Jenkins a run for her money. Ironically, during her early career she was known for both great beauty and her lovely singing voice.

Sultan Kiram apparently never saw the production in which Leona Anderson appeared or any of the other versions of The Sultan of Sulu and perhaps that was for the best, for Ade portrayed him in a less than complimentary fashion. The following sample of a few lines sung by the stage Sultan in the song "Remorse," best illustrates this:

*The cocktail is a pleasant drink
It's mild and harmless, I don't think
Last night I hoisted twenty-three
Of these arrangements into me.
It is no time for mirth and laughter
The cold grey dawn of the morning after.*

When George Ade returned to the Sulu Archipelago in 1929, the Sultan refused to see him. The possibility does exist that Sultan Kiram had listened to records from the play and it is an interesting thought that he may have heard them on the same phonograph that was given to his mother.

In the last years of his life, the Sultan of Sulu lost much of his wealth and power. He once bragged of having one thousand wives, but at the time of his death on June 7, 1936, his harem consisted of only three. He was, in many ways, a person caught between two vastly different worlds and he adjusted to the rapid changes with less culture shock than many other individuals would have experienced. And in his defense, it can be said of him that many who knew him considered him to be a kind man.

It is sad that more information on the Treaty of Sulu phonograph has not turned up. Perhaps that very machine is still around, (as is the phonograph that Robert E. Peary took along on his Arctic explorations), but more likely it has been destroyed and data about it will be forever lost to history. Whatever the eventuality, that mysterious phonograph may have started a trend, for by 1914, an article in Popular Mechanics still remarked on the popularity of phonographs among the people of the Philippines (see front cover). It is probably safe to say that there is no place in the world that the phonograph has not gone!

This article could not have been written without the interest and encouragement of several very nice people. I would like to thank Elaine C. Everly, Paul Charosh and Allen Koenigsberg for their help.

Recently produced in Japan, and distributed in the U.S. by Al Gerichten, Warren Crane, and Bill Endlein, this marks the first time Berliners have been made in 75 years. They are very close copies, and sell for $425. Collectors will have to decide how they will react to this latest news, and we would appreciate hearing your thoughts on this. Current serial numbers in use on these models are J 18425 on the reproducer, and 34371 on the motor housing. As demand exceeds supply, this may become an inevitable part of our hobby.

BOOK REVIEW

The Birth of the Talkies: From Edison to Jolson, by Harry M. Geduld, 337 pp.

The Edison Phonograph Monthly, 1903-1904 (Facsimile Edition), 180 pp.

The Song of Mister Phonograph (Piano Roll)

The invention of the phonograph almost immediately inspired predictions that some day the total illusion of life, sound and motion would be "re-created." The use of celluloid film from 1889 on made the synchronization of the phonograph and motion pictures only a matter of time. This exciting story was one of brilliant men, corporate intrigue, numerous dead-ends, and the growth of an entire entertainment industry. For the first time, most of the pertinent material has been gathered into one place, from the very beginning to The Jazz Singer, and beyond, and we are indebted to Harry M. Geduld.

Edison himself, with the aid of W. K. L. Dickson, was one of the first pioneers in both movies and accompanying sound tracks, producing a combination of the two as early as 1889. Edison's insight into entertainment possibilities was never very great and the phonograph alone was enough to absorb his interest for many years. Despite Edison's own inclinations, others joined the "race" to produce synchronized sound movies. One of the earliest entrepreneurs was Lyman Howe and his traveling show in the 1890's, and even Henri Lioret made an attempt at the 1900 Paris Exposition. Of course, as long as only music was required and the features remained a typical 1-3 minutes in length, the cylinder record was a logical choice. Speech synchronization and longer films brought problems of their own, with Edison's ultimate 1913 Kinetophone effort.

Despite Geduld's discussion of all the different apparatus, his emphasis is still mostly cultural and there are even plot outlines and scenarios of early sound films.

One really longs for some reproductions of early playbills, advertisements, machines, etc. but inexplicably, there are no illustrations, with the exception of one of Jolson. The basic sound methods are kept reasonably clear, such as separate sound synchronization, on film sound-grooves, optical sound, and magnetic sound. The problems of each are fully explained.

Minor errors of fact include Edison receiving his phonograph patent on Dec. 15, 1877 (should be Feb. 19, 1878), Wm. Friese-Greene's purchase of an Edison phonograph in 1887 (not possible), the four-minute cylinder produced in 1905, a Tainter cylinder using a mandrel (it didn't), the constant use of microphone for horn, and the misspelling of John Kruesi's name.

But there are many wonderful anecdotes, ranging from a 1908 sound film of Caruso, a lost Shackleton "talkie", the effect of sound on Walt Disney, the Vitaphone story, the work of Lee De Forest, the Pathe leap from sound to film, and much, much more. There are numerous appendices and indices of early sound films, research notes, etc. The author's strongest period is the "twenties". A collector who pursues a related interest might gather some early records which deal with early film and its stars (Let's Go Into the Picture Show, Barney Google, Since Mother Goes to Movie Shows, etc.). Film and sound are a fascinating linkage, one which we too easily take for granted. This book will remind all of us of the struggles required to make it work. It is available for $12.50 from Indiana University Press, Bloomington, Ind. 47401, or from your local bookstore.

A Collector's Guide to the Graphophone!

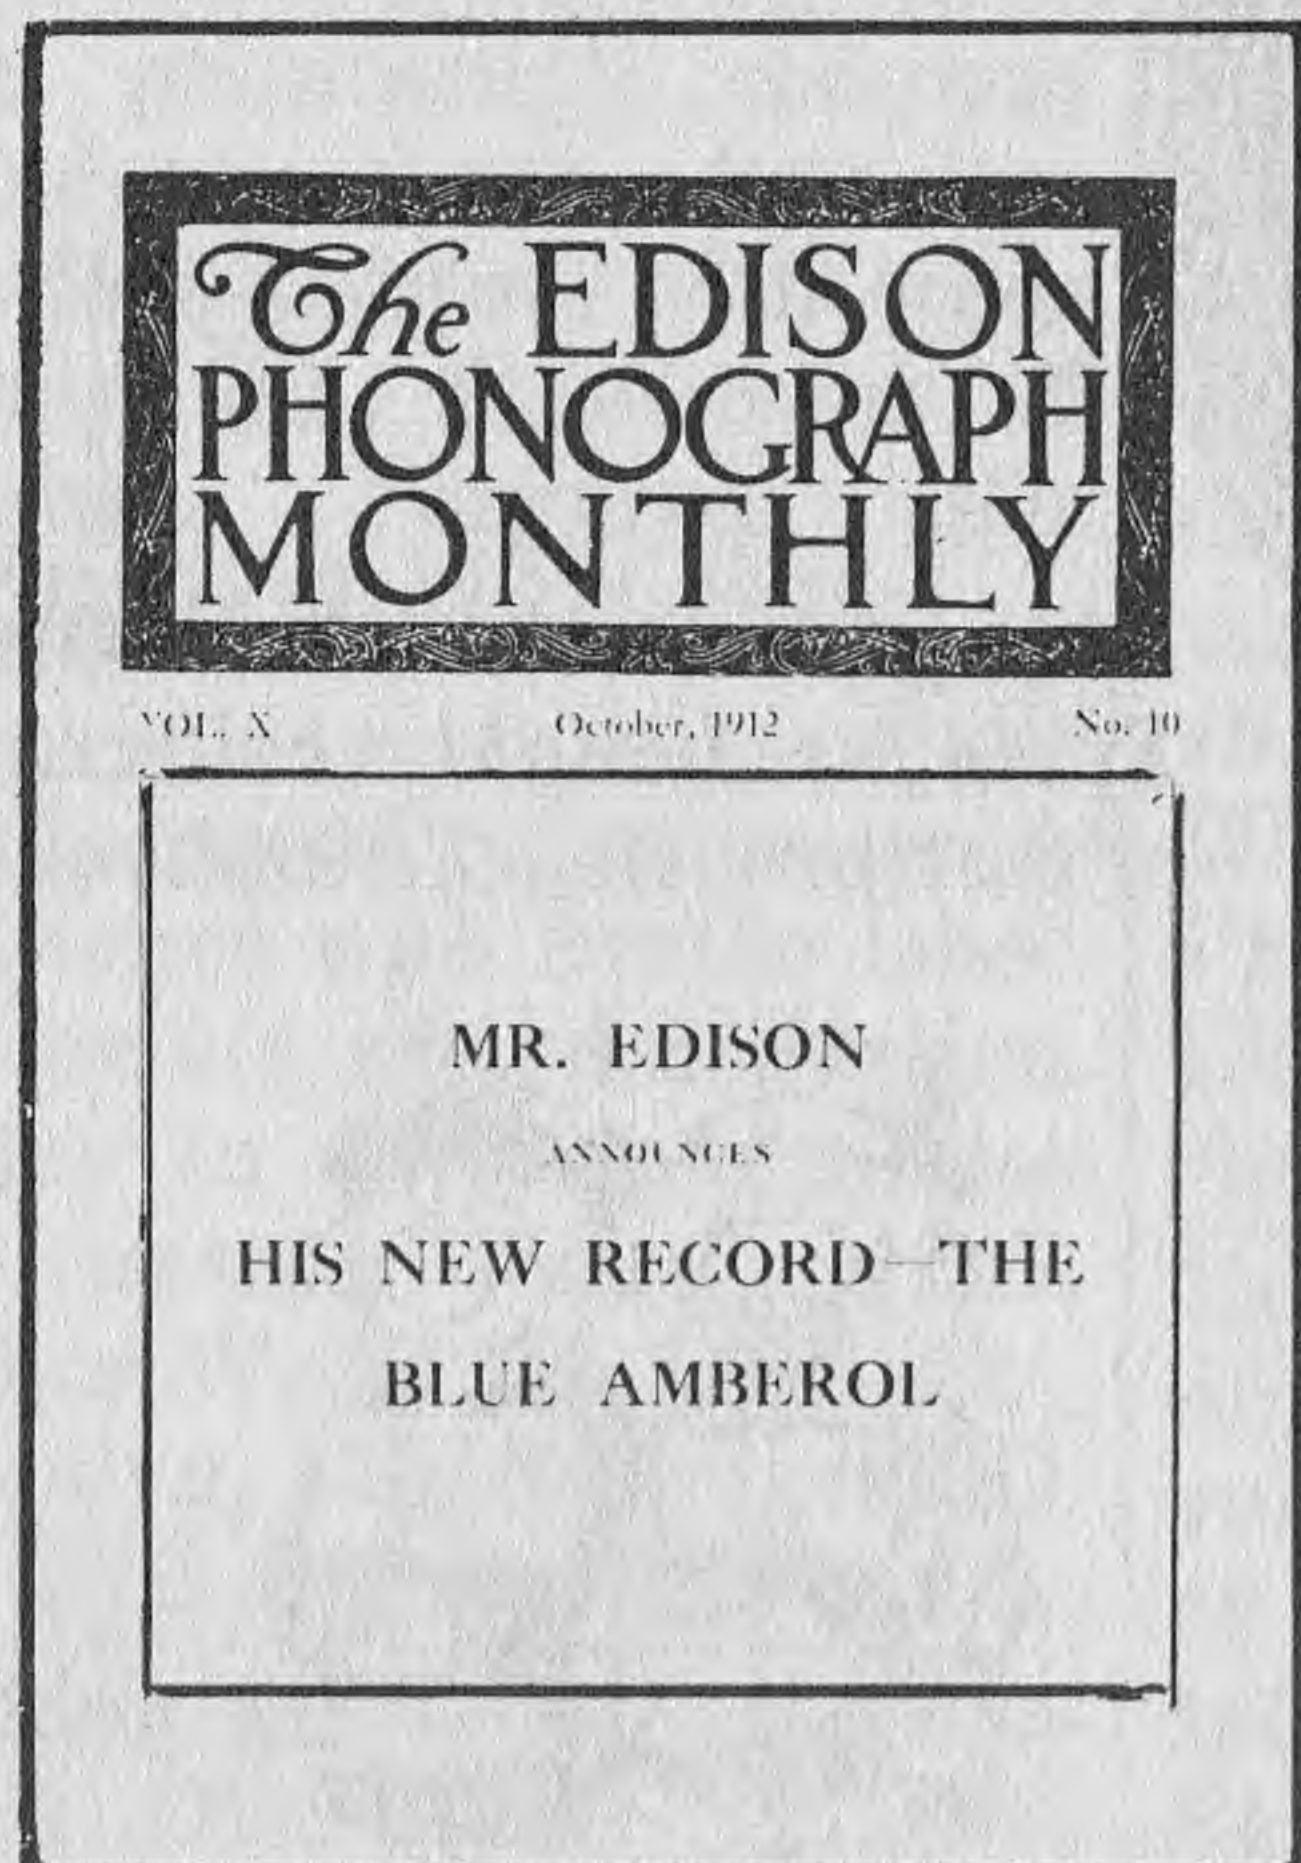

by
Howard Hazelcorn

APM is proud to announce that Howard Hazelcorn has expanded his landmark article in the June-July, 1975 issue and has now covered the years from 1894 to 1910. The exact title is A Collector's Guide to the Columbia Spring-wound Cylinder Graphophone, and it runs 40 pages with many illustrations. Book size is 5½" by 8½" and is beautifully printed and bound with washable covers. All cylinder Graphophones are covered, as well as all Columbia reproducers, with complete matching chart. And for the first time anywhere, a RARITY CHART of all the models. Now you'll know the rare ones at a glance! The work has been completed and is now at the binder's, scheduled for June 30th, 1976 delivery. Orders received before June 30th will receive, free of charge, an 1898 4-page Graphophone Sales Brochure, and a rare 4-page Graphophone Concert Program. Total cost if mailed Book Rate is $6.50 ppd. If you wish Domestic Airmail, add 45¢. If you liked Frow, you'll love Hazelcorn!

Order from Allen Koenigsberg, 650 Ocean Avenue, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11226. Satisfaction is guaranteed, and please remember that this is a limited, hand-numbered edition!

The first time available since 1916!

The Edison Phonograph Monthly!

This very successful publication was used by Thomas A. Edison for a period of almost 14 years. It was directed to all his jobbers and dealers to inform them of every new action and product of the Edison Company. This information was invaluable then — and even more so now — 60 to 73 years later!

The first year of E.P.M. (Year I, 1903) has now been reprinted from the mint originals and bound into a 190-page hard-cover book. The first 500 copies will be signed and numbered, so send your check soon. To order your copy of E.P.M. (Year I, 1903) and to reserve your special charter number for subsequent years, send $12.95 now directly to the publisher: Wendell Moore, #33 Arctic Springs, Jeffersonville, Ind. 47130. You'll be glad you did!
